Note that the melody in Phrase #7 is two measures long and, vocally, is a held note. Bluegrass banjo players seem to use these two measures to feature an ear-catching roll, or the second measure to play pick-up notes leading back to the next melody phrase. A hint about bluegrass songs: when a song features the 5 chord (in this case D) in the middle of the chord pattern, the melody note is usually the second tone of the scale (in this case A). It happens a lot and should be noted. The Phrase #7 choices are important, as you will use them in many songs.

Phrase #10 is the last note of the melody, usually the tonic note, or G in our example. This is the spot where banjo players traditionally use the phrase I call “The Lick.” The choices offer several variations. Phrase #11 is a measure of fill-in that can be used for pick-up notes leading back to the top. Here are several ways players fill this measure if not going back to the beginning.
